Students Pit Skills Against Computer, Finish Poor Second

Students in two Riviera Elementary School eighth grade classes entered the battle of man vs. machine recently and came out a very poor second. The classes weren't surprised, however, since they expected to lose.

In figuring several complex outer space problems, students in Mrs. Irma Wilson's and Ronald Hall's classes competed with an electronic computer. It took a cooperative effort of the class to complete the work in 21 hours. It took the computer about eight seconds.

The "race" was run through a parent, James Harlan, who is employed by Shell Chemical. He arranged for the students to compare the accuracy and time of their work with the Shell electronic computer. He also gave the class an insight into the workings of the computer.

STUDENT mathematical concepts got a real workout as students pondered the fact that Pluto is 3,680,000 miles from the sun, that light travels 669,613,824 miles per hour, and that a rocket would have to travel more than 25,300 miles an hour to escape from earth's gravity. With facts like these in mind, the students had to figure out:

1. What is the closest distance between the earth and each of the other eight planets in the Solar System?
2. What is the least time, in both days and years, that it would take a rocket ship to go from earth to each planet?
3. What is the distance between each planet and the earth when they are at right angles to the sun?

IN PRESENTING his report on the computer, Harlan stressed the need for good mathematics, since the computer must be fed the right information to come up with the right answers. Although machines can do a problem before a human can count to ten, the humans still must learn how to operate it and give it the necessary information, he said.

The project arose through
